Court considering upping child support payments

It has been four years since the Kansas Child Support guidelines were last updated, but that may change today. A lot of Kansas parents, especially Dads, already feel they pay too much, and a Child Support Guidelines committee is considering upping how much non-custodial parents have to shell out.

Brian Mull is with a group of concerned parents.

"I'd like to see a more extensive overhaul of the entire guidelines recognizing the connection between parenting time and parenting expenses," said Mull.

But a spokesman for the state says they're trying to make it fair for everyone.

"We have an economist who runs all those numbers, so are people spending more money on children than they used to? The answer is yes, particularly in the younger age group," he said.

The Supreme Court still has to make a final ruling on the new guidelines, but it's too early to tell when they'll go into effect.
